✓ A PARAMOUNT-BURTON HOLMES TRAVEL-PICTURE ✓

The title of the Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel-Picture for release Feb. 20th is "A Little Atlantis". Ancient Atlantis was a mythological continent which was supposed to have sunk to the bottom of the Atlantic. Its mountain peaks still form a closely connected group of islands which now bear the name of Bermuda. Around these mountain peaks the little "Coral-bugs" have built a superstructure of terraces and reefs. Mr. Holmes' "get-there-map", shows these little bugs hard at work building Bermuda. Then he takes you onto the islands, there to show you the two-legged bugs continuing the good work by their peculiar methods of quarrying the coral rock into building blocks, from which the houses on the islands, even to their roofs, are constructed. Mr. Holmes takes you to the quaint one-time capital, St. George; to Tuckerstown, where a $2,000,000 hotel, and one of the finest golf courses in the world, are now being constructed; he shows you the Devil's Hole, where every tourist goes to call upon the 300 or 400 wonderful Bermuda fish which swim in its congested waters; you visit the home of Tom Moore, the Irish poet; you go through Khyber Pass and to Inverurie and to Frascati; you then take an airplane and fly around over the land and also out over the coral reefs, - where the little bugs are still at work; you look from your lofty flight down through one thousand feet of air and sixty feet of water, to the new, as yet unborn, little Bermuda Islands of the future. It is a wonderful trip to "A Little Atlantis."
